Marmaduke's CAT TRAP

MARMADUKE MOUSE was out for a stroll when he decided to go visiting, so he slid to a halt at the door of Foolish Fox. "Wonder what old Foolish is up to today," mused Marmaduke as he rapped on the door. "Probably in a dream world with another of his crazy inventions." Just then the door flew open and there stood Foolish Fox looking as foolish as ever. "Hullo, Marmaduke," he said. "Come on in, I'm hard at work on a brand new idea." Marmaduke clucked at this because he knew that Foolish Fox was always coming up with a funny invention and they never really worked at all. "You don't say?" replied Marmaduke, looking very interested. "Well, what world-shattering plan are you working on now?"

Foolish looked mighty enthusiastic. "Well," he began. "It's really revolutionary, outstanding and stupendous, the world will beat a path to my door. You see, it's a . . . a . . ." Then he stopped suddenly and looked at Marmaduke in a very unusual way. His eyes went wide, and his mouth dropped open and he started to twiddle his thumbs. "Go on, Foolish," Marmie said impatiently. "what invention will have the world beating a path to your door?" Foolish lowered his eyes and looked very shy indeed. "As a matter of fact, Marmie," he said slowly, "it's a . . . er, well it's a mouse trap." Suddenly Marmaduke was very upset, but Foolish continued talking. "Yessir," he said proudly, "I've built a better mousetrap. Everywhere my invention will be heralded by people who have waited years to rid themselves of pesky, little mice . . . er, rodents . . . er, good heavens, Marmaduke, what am I doing?" Marmaduke looked furious. "Yes, Foolish, just what ARE you doing?" he roared in his little mouse voice. "After all, I'm your friend and you've built a silly machine to trap other little mice just like me." And with that he stormed to the door. "Well, all I have to say is it's a good thing none of your inventions are ever successful." And he slammed the door as he went out. "Good heavens," thought Foolish Fox, "and I've already arranged to market this trap with Cuthbert Cat."

At this very moment, the villainous Cuthbert Cat who didn't like Marmaduke Mouse at all, or any other mouse for that matter, came stalking up to Foolish Fox's door. "Heh, heh," he mumbled to himself. "This dumb fox is really doing me a favor. I suggested that he build a better mousetrap. Now I'll just take his model and use it to catch Marmaduke Mouse. That little cheese chaser has been giving me the slip lately." Inside he found Foolish Fox in a dither and when he saw Cuthbert enter, he seemed to fall all to pieces. "Oh," he whimpered, "hello, Cuthbert. I'm really very sorry about the mouse trap, but it's a failure. Yes," he said, assuming a sad expression. "I'm sure it won't work at all, indeed it won't." Now Cuthbert was a very suspicious cat and very anxious to get that mousetrap, so he said, "Well, never mind, just give me the model and I'll keep it as a remembrance of your efforts." Without thinking twice, Foolish handed the mousetrap to Cuthbert with a sigh of relief and Cuthbert whisked out the door. "Well," thought Foolish, "that was very smart of me, now Cuthbert thinks I've tailed and Marmaduke will never have to worry about that trap." He was startled out of his thoughts, however, when Marmaduke slipped in the back door. "Foolish, you foolish fox," he said sharply. "How could you give that mousetrap to Cuthbert. You know he'll try to catch me with it." Poor Foolish was so upset he couldn't say a word, he just stood there and looked at Marmie helplessly. "Well, anyway," said Marmaduke, "I know he has it. Perhaps I can think of a way to foil that wicked cat. Let's see the blueprints of your invention." With that Foolish Fox whipped out a big paper and handed it to Marmie. Marmaduke started to laugh.

"But Foolish," he said, "this is no different from any other mousetrap. All you do is put a piece of cheese in it and when the mouse grabs for the cheese, the piece of heavy wire clangs shut. . . ."

Marmie decided to catch Cuthbert at his own game. "After all," he thought, "if I can trick Cuthbert into catching his tail in that trap, it'll hurt him as much as it would me." And he chuckled silently at his joke. Meanwhile Cuthbert the cat was setting up the trap close by where he was sure Marmie would pass. And while he was at work, the pungent smell of the cheese reached Marmie's twitchy little nose and he decided he was very hungry indeed. Then, just in time, he remembered the trap and he sat down to wait. "I'll just sit around until Cuthbert gets tired of waiting for me," he thought. "Then when he dozes off . . . and he thought happily about his plan.

Sure enough, after a time, Cuthbert started to get drowsy. Cats really like to sleep, you know, and so every now and then he'd doze off for a few winks, coming awake suddenly to see if Marmaduke was caught in the trap. Marmie saw all this and while the cat was napping, he quickly slipped a tempting piece of catnip over near the trap. As you know, all cats dearly love catnip and the wonderful smell of it wafted through the air over to the slumbering Cuthbert and he awoke, smiling as he sniffed. His eyes popped when he saw the catnip. "Wow!" he said. "What a surprise." And forgetting all about the trap, he dashed over to the catnip, his long tail waving in the air with excitement. Now this is just what Marmie wanted because sure enough that great, big, wavy tail went KERPLUNK, right into the mousetrap and CLANG went the trap down on Cuthbert's tail, sending that tasty morsel of cheese sailing into the air and PLOP, right into Marmaduke's open mouth. Cuthbert set up an awful yowling as he danced around with the trap clinging to his tail. It hurt so much, he even forgot the catnip and Marmie was quick to scoop it up. "I'll make a deal with you, Cuthbert," he said. "If you'll let me alone, I'll release you from the trap now." Cuthbert's tail hurt him so much he agreed immediately and Marmie set him free. But no sooner was the trap off his tail than that wicked cat set out after Marmaduke. "You can't trick me, you miserable mouse," he snarled. Marmie was just a hop and a skip ahead of him, running fast and clutching the catnip to his chest. As they passed the river, he stopped and turning to face the astonished Cuthbert, he held up the tasty morsel and said, "Here, Cuthbert, CATCH!" And he tossed the catnip out over the water. Cuthbert leaped after it and landed with a huge splash in the ice cold water. Marmie stood on shore laughing until the tears rolled down his chubby cheeks. "And that's my invention, Cuthbert. It's a cat trap!" And he skipped merrily away. Cuthbert climbed out, soaking wet and shivering, and if cats could growl, you can bet he would have been growling loudly.
